It is a tale of two brothers, one of whom must die because of a long standing grudge. Both are on the path of revenge and are hired by the same client. They come up with a plan where the chosen one is to be killed on the way back to the capital and his murderer leaves for the same spot, gets into a fight and kills the police officer accompanying him. The funny aspect of the film is that it does not end with the death of the murderer but leaves it open ended, as his intended victim is a businessman from the capital who is actually about to return home. Review: This film has a different narrative set-up in every scene. It makes for a fun watch. I don't remember all the moments of the narrative but the frames that made a big impact on me are the film's brief interludes as the camera lingers in a broad setting to catch the rhythm of life going on around. Such as a post office, a police station, a college, a football ground, a petrol pump, a cafe, a railway station etc. It gives the film a humorous set of punctuations. Babu is no hero. He's a killer, a contract killer. The mafia have been hunting him. They found his friend too. He is hired to kill a guy who's about to meet his fate. The choice is between the life of a contract killer and the life of a girl. He fails to kill the guy on the way back and is to be killed. He goes into a fight with the policeman who's accompanying him. The fight gets broken up by the police but one of the policemen is shot and killed. The moral of the film is that people are not to be condemned because of their sins. Though that's not the point the film's writers are making. The director has made a film which is a little predictable and people might find the film's outcome a bit glib. But there are more than one level to any comedy. Comedy is a high art. It can be subtle and grounded or easily out of the blue and wacky. This film is both. Mamta is a girl who's about to wed. She is also a character in the film. Her life and her family are in a cocked situation. Her sister, younger brother, friends etc are all mixed up. Mamta has a moment of clarity when she realizes that she's not yet 82157476af
